“...Immigrant labor and economics...originally brought Director Sara Dosa to the subject, but she found a more poignant theme...on family that makes this movie more rewarding.”

April 29, 2016 – (New York, NY) – Sara Dosa’s acclaimed documentary THE LAST SEASON will premiere Tuesday, May 31, 2016 at 8 p.m. on WORLD Channel (check local listings), as part of the fourth season of AMERICA REFRAMED, public media’s newest documentary series hosted by Natasha Del Toro. The broadcast will be followed by 90 days of free streaming for audiences across the U.S. at www.worldchannel.org/americareframed starting on June 1st.

In the forests of Oregon’s Cascade Mountains, bustling camps of migrant workers hunt the elusive matsutake mushroom. Here, Kouy Loch, a 46-year-old former platoon leader of Cambodia’s Khmer Freedom Fighters crosses paths with Roger Higgins, an ailing 75-year-old sniper formerly with the U.S. Special Forces in Vietnam. The unlikely pair find more than just mushrooms in the woods; they create a familial bond and a means to slowly heal the wounds of war. Told over the course of one matsutake mushroom season, THE LAST SEASON illuminates the delicate balance of nature to render a moving portrait of love and the cycle of life.

Each September, the rural town of Chemult, Oregon, with a population of only 135 persons, is flooded with hundreds of seasonal mushroom hunters. Many are immigrants from Laos, Cambodia and Thailand who entered the U.S. as refugees in the 1980s. They come to harvest the rare matsutake mushroom, which is prized in Japanese cuisine. Subject to extreme market fluctuations, the mushrooms can yield a mean of $40 per pound, though the delicacy can fetch up to $600 per pound and sometimes even more.
Kouy Loch, whose primary residence is in Stockton, California, carries with him a picture of his daughter, Janette. He is saving part of his earnings for her eighth birthday celebration. When Kouy was a child, the Khmer Rouge killed his father. As a young man, Kouy became a platoon leader for the freedom fighters. He lived in the jungle and slept with an AK47 wrapped in his arms. Under the Khmer Rouge and its slave labor, Kouy learned to forage for anything he could find, including mushrooms, insects and worms. This experience, he says, taught him how to earn a living as a mushroom hunter in the U.S.

In the mountains, Roger, the former sniper, lives in a humble wood-paneled home with his wife Theresa. A chain smoker, Roger’s labored breathing is alleviated by a portable oxygen source. On a good day, Roger can bathe and dress himself. He also suffers from PTSD and vivid nightmares. Sometimes, Theresa wakes up hearing him speak in foreign languages that she does not recognize.

Having seen each other for years, it was not until a sixth mushroom season that Roger and Kouy talked about their respective war experiences, flashbacks and nightmares. Beyond friendship, a father-son bond blossomed when Kouy kneeled before Theresa and Roger asking permission to take them as his parents and requesting they accept him as their son. In turn, Roger and Theresa hope Kouy will meet a nice woman, use their lumber to build a home, and live near them in the woods year-round.

The fleeting matsutake mushroom season generally lasts two months. With the first signs of an early winter before them, the workers break down their encampment and Kouy makes preparations to leave Oregon. As the family exchange bittersweet hugs and goodbyes, Theresa and Kouy brace themselves fearing the proximity of Roger’s last season.
