“Art and activism often go hand in hand, yet, even among artists whose work is oriented toward social justice, it’s rare to find someone whose creativity and community-building work are as naturally entwined as Berkeley’s Edythe Boone.” – Jessica Zack, San Francisco Chronicle

January 7, 2017 – (New York, NY) – Marlene “Mo” Morris’ debut documentary feature A NEW COLOR: THE ART OF BEING EDYTIE BOONE will have its U.S. television premiere Tuesday, February 14, 2017 at 8 p.m. on WORLD Channel (check local listings), as part of the new season of public media’s AMERICA REFRAMED. The documentary series is dedicated to highlighting intimate stories by emerging and veteran filmmakers who are chronicling an ever-changing America. The broadcast will be followed by free streaming for audiences across the U.S. at www.worldchannel.org/americareframed starting on February 15th.

A New Color focuses on the life and work of muralist, activist and educator, Edythe (Edy) Boone, a self-taught artist from East Harlem who moved to the San Francisco Bay Area in search of a safe environment for her children. Filmed over five years, Morris follows Boone, the spirited and captivating septuagenarian who became an artist/activist simply because empowering and building community is “the right thing to do.” Concerned about the exceedingly high number of senseless deaths amongst young Black men in the U.S., Boone uses these injustices as part of the narrative in her murals.

When Boone was a little girl, she dreamt of creating a new color—one the world has never before seen. She was inspired by her grandmother, a seamstress, whose private quarters resembled an artist’s studio with fabric, patterns and colors. Boone’s muse and first role model— her grandmother—could create anything. As a child, Boone lived her first six years with an orthodox Jewish family who nurtured her intellectual curiosity and influenced her respect for all cultures. Her art and social practice was also informed by the Black Power and Civil Rights movements, periods which made an impact on her paintings – both on canvas and in public space. She explores representations of African Americans to convey a complex inner world and humanity, while confronting racial stereotypes and social inequities. Boone lived for many years in East Harlem’s James Weldon Johnson public housing where she made her first murals and organized the tenants. After confronting the New York City Housing Authority with the tenants’ complaints, the city agency provided her with paint. The movement she started led to new murals in 25 public buildings; a result she believed could foster trust and community building.

Perhaps best known for her work on the iconic San Francisco Women’s Building mural, “Maestrapeace,” (1995) Boone was one of the seven original muralists. The film captures these artists mentoring a new generation of artists and restoring the mural alongside them. Boone believes that art is for everyone and that collaborative artmaking can be a transformative experience for children and adults of all ages. Like many artists, she enjoys getting immersed in the creation of her personal work. Driven by the practice of engaging others through public art and mural making, she tackles difficult issues, such as the deaths of young Black males that include Trayvon Martin, Michael Brown, Sean Bell, Kenny Johnson, and her nephew, Eric Garner. Ultimately, Boone’s mission is to empower individuals and transform communities through art and activism.
