“Ronit Bezalel’s thought-provoking documentary, 70 Acres in Chicago: Cabrini Green, is a startling case study into the making and destruction of one of Chicago’s most infamous public housing projects.” – Tony Binns, Rolling Out

January 7, 2017 – (New York, NY) – Ronit Bezalel’s award-winning documentary 70 Acres in Chicago: Cabrini Green will have its U.S. television premiere Tuesday, February 21, 2017 at 8 p.m. on WORLD Channel (check local listings), as part of the new season of public media’s AMERICA REFRAMED. The documentary series is dedicated to highlighting intimate stories by emerging and veteran filmmakers chronicling an ever-changing America. The broadcast will be followed by free streaming for audiences across the U.S. at www.worldchannel.org/america reframed, starting on February 22nd.

70 Acres in Chicago: Cabrini Green explores the effects of Chicago’s 1.5 billion dollar Plan for Transformation, an order requiring the demolition of the city’s public housing high rises, and the building of mixed-income condominiums. The film chronicles the demolitions at the Cabrini Green Homes, a development erected from 1942-1962 as a housing solution for the working poor. Located a mile from Chicago’s world-famous lakefront, the neighborhoods adjacent to Cabrini Green are some of the most conspicuous and symbolic reminders of income inequality in the city. Among Cabrini locals, this sharp dividing line is familiarly expressed as a distinction between the “gold coast” and the “soul coast.”

Filmed over two-decades, 70 Acres in Chicago is a remarkable 20-year look at the Cabrini Green redevelopment process, starting in the mid-’90’s as the demolitions begin. Concerns quickly arise over the implementation of the Plan for Transformation and the lack of input afforded to existing residents. The community fights back; they file lawsuits, march and rally. Yet many families wonder if the new housing will accommodate the old residents, or if they will be forced to find affordable housing elsewhere.
Community tension and uncertainty are depicted in town halls and visits from local representatives. The dialogues encapsulate many of the questions with no easy answers brought about by urban renewal. Against this backdrop, the film introduces several longtime residents: Deidre Brewster, Mark Pratt and Raymond McDonald, whose stories over the coming years remain in focus.

The film also sheds light on the city’s history of racial segregation, which prevents the mobility of Black families, the historical Great Migration of African Americans from the south moving north, and the demolition of the area’s previous community, “Little Sicily,” which was razed to build Cabrini Green.

Complex issues emerge as communities previously on opposite sides of the proverbial tracks begin to occupy the same buildings. While some new residents show a willingness to break down old barriers, painful reminders of double standards and privilege gaps remain.

More than a specific portrait of a single housing development, 70 Acres in Chicago: Cabrini Green illuminates the layers of socio-economic forces and the difficult questions behind urban redevelopment and gentrification taking place in cities throughout the United States today.

"Should the high-rises have been demolished? This film doesn't provide easy answers," Ronit Bezalel, filmmaker of 70 Acres in Chicago said. “Instead, we want viewers to generate their own discussions on ways society can address affordable housing and poverty issues. We want to educate viewers on the history; that especially in Chicago, but also throughout the country, low-income people of color have constantly been moved out of the city center."

70 Acres in Chicago is a sequel to Bezalel's critically acclaimed Voices of Cabrini: Remaking Chicago's Public Housing (1999), a documentary chronicling the initial redevelopment of Cabrini Green from the perspective of residents, community activists, and local business owners. Voices of Cabrini was described by Newsweek as a “touchstone in the debate over public housing.” Chicago film veteran Judy Hoffman is the Executive Producer of both documentaries.
