“An intimate insight into overwhelming injustice: Though the adversity American Indians face can often be overwhelming to witness, the bravery of George and his peers is enough to inspire hope that the long fight will be passed into good hands.”
- Chloe Walker, Filminquiry.com

September 6, 2017 – (New York, NY) – ON A KNIFE EDGE tells the story of George Dull Knife, a Lakota teenager growing up on South Dakota’s Pine Ridge Reservation. The film traces George’s path to activism, inspired by his family’s long history of fighting for justice for Native Americans. His focus: shutting down the liquor stores in Whiteclay, a tiny town nearby that exists only to sell beer – almost 5 million cans a year – to the reservation’s vulnerable population. In this coming-of-age story, George and the Dull Knife family are connected to historic and contemporary social justice and civil rights struggles in the Native American community through AIM, the grassroots American Indian Movement.

ON A KNIFE EDGE by Jeremy Williams and Eli Cane will have its national television broadcast premiere on AMERICA REFRAMED on Tuesday, November 7, 2017, at 8 p.m. on WORLD Channel (check local listings). The film is part of WORLD Channel’s November programming in celebration of Native American Heritage Month. America ReFramed is dedicated to highlighting intimate stories by emerging and veteran filmmakers who are chronicling an ever-changing America. Free online streaming of the documentary starts November 8th on www.americareframed.org

The story unfolds amid rising racial tension, violence and community protests. George is reared by his father who hopes he will assume a leadership role in the campaign for social justice and Native American rights. With an ancestral legacy he can trace back more than a hundred years, George wrestles to make sense of the old Lakota ways in today’s world where the odds are stacked against him.

George and his community of peers on the reservation face daunting obstacles: a high school dropout rate of 70 percent; an average family income of $2600 per year (well below the minimum wage); and rising hate crimes, gun and police violence, suicide, and alcohol and drug abuse.

George’s growing political awareness leads him on a collision course with the police and the reservation’s tribal council. Among his immediate concerns are the Native American young girls and children who are assaulted as a result of alcohol abuse. In response to the protests at Whiteclay, the tribal council proposes a referendum that would legalize alcohol on the reservation. Despite the activism of George and his youth peers, voters approve the sale of alcohol on the reservation. Facing this setback, he begins feeling powerless and questions the wisdom of peaceful methods and the relevance of AIM.

However, as he matures, George discovers that the responsibilities of manhood are more complex than simply confronting authority. “People say the Indian War ended in 1890; for the Lakota the war is still going,” says George as he strives to balance duty to his people with that of his immediate family.

Told largely through George’s eyes, the film offers a glimpse into the youngest generation of the AIM, as well as George’s own evolving notions of Native identity and manhood. His story is interwoven with animated sequences that depict five generations of family history, narrated by his father, Guy and based on paintings he has created to explore the continuum of their fight through the generations.
